When Senator Albert J. Beveridge first located in Indianapolis, says Judge, he was engaged in the trial of a case in which his opponent was no less a person than the late Benjamin Harrison. The young man's policy throughout the case was that of the gadfly—he hung close about, buzzed, stung, made every attempt to attract the attention of his distinguished opponent—all to no avail. Harrison's attitude was that of utter ignorance of the young lawyer's existence. That he was really aware of it, however, was evidenced by a remark made to a brother attorney som eweeks fater: "It would be a good thing for the action of the white demothat young man if he were occasionally visited by a doubt."
